WORKING PAPERS

Strategic Redundancies in Sustainability Food Labels and Claims: Do They Inform or Mislead Consumers? (Job Market Paper)

This paper examines how consumers respond to potentially redundant claims (e.g., non-GMO) added to packages or grocery shelves when labels promoting credence attributes about sustainable production practices are already in place (e.g., USDA organic seal). Using unique scanner data and collected detailed labeling information, we define and analyze three types of redundancies in sustainability-related messaging. Our results suggest that the USDA organic seal substantially increases sales, underscoring its credibility and broad appeal to consumers. However, we also find that its effectiveness varies across product categories and depends on the absence or presence of other statements made on packages or the shelf. Our analyzed redundant statements (e.g., non-GMO, Local shelf talkers, vegan claims) do not provide additional information, but nonetheless affect purchasing decisions. Additionally, we find that price promotions are the most effective way to capture consumers' attention and compete with labels and claims at the point of sale. We conclude by arguing that labeling effects cannot be analyzed in isolation. The influence of food labels and claims depends on how manufacturers and retailers strategically position and promote their products in response to consumers' product-specific associations. Consequently, policymakers should consider integrated policy measures that coordinate labeling and in-store information provision, rather than regulating or designing these elements separately.
